Synopsis of Speedwriting 3
Complete Listing of Principles Under the Various Letters of the Alphabet.

Dictionary 29
Approximately 20,000 Words of Most Frequent Occurrence.

Phrases 241
A Listing of over 4,000 Phrases Arranged Alphabetically for Quick Reference.

FOREWORD

THIS Dictionary and Phrase Book has been compiled as an easy reference key for the student of Speedwriting. It will be of especial help to one who wishes to extend his study into new fields after he has completed the Elementary Course.

Approximately 20,000 words and over 4,000 phrases have been coded for this work. These words and phrases have been carefully selected from many different sources of material. The plurals, and the adverbial and participial endings of words have been generally omitted in order to make the work as compact as possible.

The arrangement and compilation of this dictionary has been done largely by Mr. Charles E. Smith, whose cumulative experience in the teaching of shorthand and typewriting for over a quarter of a century has placed him in a position where he has trained every World's Professional Champion Typist. His work has given him an opportunity to observe the needs and discrepancies in shorthand such as has been afforded to no other man.

We wish to acknowledge the helpful suggestions and criticisms made by Rowland Hector Mode, M.A., Ph.D., Toronto, Canada, formerly Professor of the Oriental Languages and Literatures; and to Kenneth Richmond, author of "Permanent Values in Education," etc., London, England. Our special thanks are due to Miss Doris Liftchild, of New York, for valuable suggestions and assistance in the preparation of the manuscript.

EMMA B. DEARBORN.

New York, 1930.

INTRODUCTION

ALWAYS there is a genesis, a seed by the wayside, a word, a nod, a hint to fire the heart of the dreamer, and inspire that divine enthusiasm which leads on and on to the final triumphant goal.

What it was that turned Emma B. Dearborn to the study and teaching of many different systems of shorthand writing, we do not know. What we do know is that the seeds of shorthand fell upon fertile soil; that Miss Dearborn was eminently successful in teaching the different systems of which she made herself the master; and that from the knowledge and experience so gained she developed a systematic brief method of writing the English language with the ordinary alphabetic characters that is far in advance of any similar attempts by shorthand authors who have preceded her.

As early as 1857 Andrew J. Graham devised and advocated three styles of Brief Longhand. Of the more advanced, or Third Style, he wrote as follows: "In the Third Style of Brief Longhand, there is no settled list of word-signs in addition to those of the Second Style. Contractions, however, in accordance with the established principles of abbreviation, are employed to the utmost extent consistent with legibility; and the majority of vowels and silent consonants are omitted; and the writer may resort to any labor-saving device which his experience and invention may suggest. The Third Style is designed for use on all occasions where speed of writing is of primary importance, as in copying letters, making abstracts of, and quotations from, books read,—taking notes of lectures, sermons, discussions, testimony, charges, etc.,—and in rough-sketching articles for the press, or of any kind whatever." This was many years prior to the invention of the first practical typewriter. In fact it would not have been possible to write Graham's system on a typewriter, as it was necessary to elevate the letters which represented the prefixes and suffixes.

Speedwriting—the very name has a fascinating lure—possesses a double advantage because it may be written with pen or pencil, or on a typewriter. In its development this double advantage was kept steadily in mind. It is not necessary for the student of Speedwriting to "resort to any labor-saving device which his experience and invention may suggest," because the system is abundantly supplied with labor-saving devices taken from the experience and inventive genius of the author.

Doubtless the ordinary Speedwriting expert will be content to use a pen or a pencil for most routine office dictation. For those who desire to attain extraordinary skill we have visions of what may be attained when the typewriter is brought into use for the purpose of taking dictation. An analysis of the matter used in one of the World's Championship Shorthand Contests indicates that a Speedwriting expert capable of writing at the rate of 60 five-stroke words a minute on the typewriter would attain a speed of not less than 125 words a minute when writing the same number of strokes in Speedwriting. When we consider the fact that expert typists have demonstrated their ability to write for a period of one hour at the rate of over 130 five-stroke words a minute, and for a short time at over 160 five-stroke words a minute, we hesitate to predict what depths may yet be sounded by a Speedwriting expert with the fingering dexterity of one of those prodigies of the typewriter.

Speedwriting was not put forward with the idea of furthering the interests of spelling reform; yet who would be so bold as to say that its use for utilitarian purposes may not (in a few years) do more to break down the prejudice against spelling reform than was accomplished by that gallant band of spelling reformers in all the years of earnest effort since Isaac Pitman first set out to make all the world phonetic.

It has been a fascinating task to co-operate with the author of Speedwriting in the compilation of this first Speedwriting Dictionary, and in the preparation of the Synopsis of the System which it seemed necessary to include in order to indicate the changes and improvements in the system which the printing of the dictionary affords an opportunity of presenting.

CHARLES E. SMITH.
